

Others

These are just representative samples of many thousands of technological advances and technology-enabled efforts empowering people to create, manage and improve lives, conditions, communities and outcomes for all during this period of great change. As a trend, they represent a shift of capacity from well-funded, centralized corporate efforts, pushing products and services on the supply side to maximize business owners' artificial monetary profits, to individuals, communities and smaller organizations pushing back against mighty corporate machines, creating services and tools to help common people improve our lot on the human demand side. They refocus us on real wealth, instead of meaningless fake money numbers on papers and in machines. They help us create better humans and worlds.